Axis mundi: roadside chapel-shrines and crosses

Wayside chapel-shrines, especially crosses, have been a recognisable sign of Christianity since the Middle Ages. These were built and are for votive, ritual or thanksgiving purposes. The objects also served as borders marks. Particularly many crosses were built in the 17th and 18th centuries in Upper Silesia region, during religious persecution and numerous wars. The Eastern Małopolska (Lesser Poland), or geographically – Podkarpacie (Subcarpathia), also has its spiritual wealth in the form of objects of this kind, still being a place of lively religious activities. This small cult architecture, with a characteristic form have also become the meeting place for local communities, building their relationships with nature. It is worth recalling in this place the famous painting by Nicolas Poussin Et in Arcadia Ego, which assumes a hypothetical connection between culture and nature, expressed in the language of classicism in the 17th century Baroque period. The image shows in the opinion of the interpreters of this outstanding work, the inevitability of death, even in the land of happiness.

The sacrality of the world continues?

The essence of the spiritual world has always been sacred and associated with the idea of divinity. The sacrality has been intrinsically connected with magic, religion and worship (rites) since the prehistoric times. In the 20th century this attitude was clearly shaken. This happened more in urban communities, which have undergone modernisation, now also symbolised by the human crowd, what was mentioned, e.g. by Walter Benjamin and other writers. But the landscape, as a form of nature, usually does not change much and lasts for centuries. Only the people change. Krzysztof Ligęza, however, wants to show the passage of time, including the views surrounding the chapel-shrines. He also disagrees with the ahistorical attitude of Mircea Eliade, who did not see the process of historical change.

The chapel-shrines and crosses from Krzysztof Ligęza’s images determine, what is an important discovery of these photographs, the “axis mundi” – spiritual fireplaces that existed from the beginning of civilisations, in its various geographical and mental spaces, as Eliade wrote. In this intention Zofia Rydet had been photographing houses, looking like temples filled with objects of religious worship, in her famous mega-series, The Sociological Record 1978-1990. There is a story behind each chapel. As Eliade wrote, in reference to the concept of Rudolf Otto, the sacred: “[.....] At the same time attracts a man and arouses fear in him. The gods are both good and frightening”.¹ This issue is partially depicted in the Ligęza’s sound recording, not devoid of humorous accents, a story on the spirit of a horse that appeared nearby Jezioro Rożnowskie (Lake). Since the shrine was built there, the ghost has never been seen.

Is the sacred possible to be photographed? Some of its visible aspects can be shown, e.g. people’s relationship or attempts to communicate with God. Some artistic projects in this area were successful, for example: Mariusz Wieczorkowski, Stanisław Woś, Andrzej Różycki, Zbigniew Treppa, and Janusz Leśniak. Now Krzysztof Ligęza opens the new possibilities for this type of photography, directing it to the landscape area, in which there is a hidden a question on spirituality of a man – child, adult, as well as a person facing death.

The sacrality of the world will last as long as we speak of a man, in the sense of a religious being, as described by religious studies scholars, including Mircea Eliade. However, according to some philosophers and art theoreticians, such a religious attitude is no longer valid (Jacques Derrida) or disappears in connection with the creation of the so-called artificial intelligence and an intermediate form between the old man and the new android. It is worth noting that according to Krzysztof Ligęza, the sacral nature of the world is independent of man. Cosmos means in Greek order and harmony. But in my opinion this is not so obvious, because order for some means chaos for others, e.g. Buddhists.

Family and community are one
The photographer points out a very important aspect regarding traditional ties: family, but also the local community. Tradition is shown as the source of their empowerment. Currently there are some attempts (also as a part of the European Union’s social policy) made to displace a traditional family and to promote new, artificial creations related to LGBT movement, such as homosexual marriages as well as transgression of the traditional gender category. But the family, if it is to be one, cannot change its indisputable rules that determine its stability and morality based on Christianity. There is also hope in Ligęza’s photographs. Hope for the continuity of the traditional community and its basic principles set by the “axis mundi” of the cardinal principles of Christian ethics. If they disappear, the world modernised to the limits may sink into technological utopia and destruction, following the Nietzschean principle of „beyond good and evil” which so strongly influenced the modernism of the early twentieth century and is now popular in the next phase liberated from previous utopian postmodern obligations.

Is Poland in this area a positive enclave or a relic of the past? A symbolic and romantic picture with a very positive message emerges from the photographs of Krzysztof Ligęza. This of course is for those, who mainly believe. To what extent does this bond, built largely on the basis of invariable religious rituals, is authentic and strong? Time will tell.
What time, what place is it in this photograph?

On glancing it seems that each image operates and, as a consequence, preserves the instantaneous time, recording and describing (Edgar Morin) the reality. But how much is it connected with the imagination of the photographer about eternal nature and the manifestations of the reality of the sacred? Landscape plays a key role in the series. It presents places of worship, people and animals. The artist photographs both small towns and urban landscapes, showing religious life in urbanised places, sometimes using the so-called “bird’s-eye view”, which is a slightly different, wider point of view, and still rarely used on a larger scale. Sometimes the people are frozen in prayer and concentration, while others are in motion, which introduces an element of dynamism and visual contrast. An important role is also played by animals shown here, including flying birds. These are not artificial actions or the use of sensation, but the manifestation of a specific vision of the world. The role of the spiritual community is emphasized by light, also in the form of a rainbow, which is depicted here as a good, divine sign of the covenant. Landscapes are complemented by the portraits of psychological kind, depicting the local residents. However it is within the limits of reality. Too pompous art, despite its artistic character, like some of the paintings from the nineteenth century, is something distant and somewhat irrelevant to the latest artistic practice.

In the photographs of Ligęza, we see the imaging accentuated by a sophisticated use of colour. The artist uses a rare type of a painter’s sensitivity. It turns out that in the era of another digital revolution the colour can be successfully used, incorporating the experience of Caspar David Friedrich or Ivan Ajwazowski into artistic capabilities. But the influence of these painters should be treated in a general and non-literal way.

Photographic document with pictorial qualities

As a result, we are looking at a documentary photography with painting qualities, showing the reality and traceability of places and people. Such a photographic attitude reminds the interwar work of Jan Bułhak included in the album Pomorze (Pomerania) from the series Poland in the photographic images of Jan Bułhak and of course the aforementioned Zofia Rydet. At this point, I would like to mention that the series seems to me the most important continuation of Rydet’s achievements. It is not easy to add new problems here, but Krzysztof Ligęza managed to do this, because he showed new possibilities of imaging in this type of photography. It is worth noting that the author also made 3D panoramas as part of the series. These were already presented at the large collective exhibition Negotiating identity. Between real and virtual in the photography from the 21st century (2018). The 3D views show the world in a macro and micro scale, with the possibility of “virtual reaching the sky” and listening to the authentic prayers with sound recordings. Building a multimedia project based on related artistic techniques testifies the artistic awareness and maturity of the author.
